IRASS Journal of Arts, Humanities and Social Sciences
https://irasspublisher.com/journal-details/IJAHSS
ISSN (Online) 3049-0170

A Comparative Study of Shashi Deshpande and Bharati Mukherjee Negotiations of Gender, Identity, and Cultural Transformation

T. Sailaja[1*] & V. B. Chithra[2]

[*1]Assistant Professor [Adhoc], Dept. of Humanities and Social Sciences, JNTUA college of Engineering, Anantapuramu

[2]Professor and Director [WEC], JNTUA, Anantapuramu

Corresponding Author: T. Sailaja

Assistant Professor [Adhoc], Dept. of Humanities and Social Sciences, JNTUA college of Engineering, Anantapuramu

Article History

Received: 13 / 08 / 2025

Accepted: 12 / 11 / 2025

Published: 26 / 11 /2025

Abstract: This research paper presents an extended comparative study of two important Indian English writers, Shashi Deshpande and Bharati Mukherjee, whose works focus on the lives of women facing different kinds of pressures and changes. While both write about gender inequality and the search for selfhood, they are shaped by very different worlds: Deshpande writes mainly about middle-class women living in India, and Mukherjee writes about women who move across countries and cultures. Deshpande's fiction examines quiet suffering, emotional loneliness, and gradual self-realization inside the family and the home. Mukherjee's fiction, in contrast, explores immigration, racial discrimination, cultural clash, and the bold remaking of identity in foreign lands. This paper compares their themes, treatment of marriage and domesticity, images of violence and trauma, narrative techniques, and feminist positions, and shows how together they expand the map of Indian English feminist writing from local domestic spaces to global diasporic spaces.

Keywords: Diasporic Transformation, sexual violence, active reinvention, physical violence.

How to Cite in APA format: Sailaja, T. & Chithra, V. B. (2025). A Comparative Study of Shashi Deshpande and Bharati Mukherjee Negotiations of Gender, Identity, and Cultural Transformation. IRASS Journal of Arts, Humanities and Social Sciences, 2(11), 36-40.

Introduction

Indian English literature after independence has seen the strong rise of women novelists who question the traditional image of the "ideal" Indian woman and instead present women as thinking, feeling individuals with their own conflicts and desires. These writers draw attention to issues such as gender roles, social control, marriage, sexuality, migration, and the struggle to define one's own identity.

Shashi Deshpande and Bharati Mukherjee are two such powerful voices, but they stand at different locations—both literally and symbolically. Deshpande writes from inside India and looks mainly at the Indian middle class; her focus is on the inner life of women who appear "normal" on the outside but carry deep wounds and questions within. Her novels reveal how social expectations about a "good wife" or "good daughter" slowly suffocate a woman's sense of self.

Bharati Mukherjee, on the other hand, became a major voice of the Indian diaspora in North America. Her fiction presents women who move from India to the United States, Canada, or other countries and have to rebuild their lives in multicultural, sometimes hostile surroundings. These women face not only patriarchy but also racism, immigration laws, cultural shocks, and the loneliness of exile.

Comparing Deshpande and Mukherjee allows a deeper understanding of how space and culture shape women's experiences—Deshpande's woman is mostly rooted within Indian domestic structures, while Mukherjee's woman is in motion across borders. Yet both are connected by their struggle for voice, dignity, and self-definition.

Literary Background and Worldview

Shashi Deshpande: The Voice of Indian Middle-Class Womanhood

Shashi Deshpande, born in 1938 in Karnataka, grew up in an educated and culturally active family; her father, Adya Rangacharya, was a well-known Kannada playwright. This background influenced her interest in human psychology, especially the inner conflicts of women in a changing Indian society.

Her major novels—That Long Silence, The Dark Holds No Terrors, Roots and Shadows, The Binding Vine, and Small Remedies—deal with women who are educated and aware but still trapped in traditional expectations. Deshpande frequently chooses a first-person female narrator, which helps the reader enter the mind of the protagonist and share her self-questioning thoughts.

In That Long Silence, Deshpande's protagonist Jaya has sacrificed her own ambitions to fit into her roles as wife and mother, only to discover that her life has become empty and voiceless. Jaya's use of two names—Jaya and Suhasini—symbolizes her split identity: one brave and honest, the other socially acceptable and silent. Similarly, in The Dark Holds No Terrors, Sarita (Saru) is a successful doctor but suffers from emotional and cin her marriage, which she is forced to hide for the sake of respectability.

Deshpande's worldview is not openly revolutionary; instead, it focuses on slow inner change. She believes that women must first recognize how they have been conditioned to accept inequality before they can claim their individuality. Her feminism is often described as liberal and humanist, seeking balance between tradition and personal freedom.

This is an open access article under the CC BY-NC license

Bharati Mukherjee: The Voice of Diasporic Transformation

Bharati Mukherjee (1940–2017) was born in Kolkata and later migrated to the United States, where she spent most of her life teaching and writing. Her personal experience of migration, displacement, and adaptation strongly shapes her fiction. Unlike Deshpande's mostly Indian settings, Mukherjee's works are located in cities such as New York, Toronto, and San Francisco, as well as in Indian urban and rural spaces linked through migration.

Key works like The Tiger's Daughter, Wife, Jasmine, The Middleman and Other Stories, Desirable Daughters, and Leave It to Me examine how immigrants, especially women, struggle to create a stable sense of self while constantly navigating different cultures. Her characters often change names, professions, and relationships as they move from one country to another, suggesting that identity in a diasporic world is flexible and often unstable.

For example, Jasmine in Jasmine travels from a poor Indian village to the United States, passing through experiences of love, death, violence, and illegal migration, and each phase forces her to adopt a new identity. Mukherjee's worldview is that immigration, while painful and risky, can also be a process of empowerment that allows women to break from limiting traditions and claim new forms of "Americanness" or global identity.

Thus, if Deshpande's fictional universe is about stability, roots, and inner conflict, Mukherjee's universe is about movement, rupture, and reinvention.

Major Themes: A Comparative Study

Identity Formation

For Deshpande, identity is closely related to family roles and social position. Women in her novels are daughters who must obey parents, wives who must please husbands, and mothers who must sacrifice for children. Because of this, they often suppress their desires and gradually lose a clear sense of self. Jaya in That Long Silence realizes that by always adjusting and remaining quiet, she has allowed others to decide who she is. Her journey toward selfhood is slow and painful, involving self-criticism and acceptance of her own mistakes as well as society's.

Mukherjee approaches identity as something never fixed, especially in the case of immigrants. Jasmine, for instance, moves from being Jyoti, a village girl, to Jasmine, the wife of a young man dreaming of America, then to Jase and Jane, each name marking different cultural and emotional positions. Other characters like Dimple in Wife or Tara in Desirable Daughters also experience torn identities, feeling neither completely Indian nor completely Western.

Identity Aspect	Shashi Deshpande	Bharati Mukherjee
Basis of identity	Family, marriage, social norms	Migration, race, cultural contact
Movement	From silence to awareness	From rootedness to hybridity
Process	Introspective and psychological	External, experimental, and risky

Deshpande portrays identity as rediscovery within limits, while Mukherjee portrays it as active reinvention across cultural borders.

Marriage and Domesticity

Marriage is one of the central institutions in Deshpande's novels, often shown as a place of emotional imbalance and muted pain. In The Dark Holds No Terrors, Saru's marriage to Manohar reveals gendered power games, where the husband feels threatened by his wife's professional success and expresses this threat through sexual violence. The home, which should be a safe and loving space, becomes a site of fear and confusion for Saru. In That Long Silence, Jaya's marriage to Mohan exposes the unspoken assumptions that the husband's career and social image matter more than the wife's aspirations.

Mukherjee's treatment of marriage includes all of this but adds another layer: immigration stress. In Wife, Dimple's arranged marriage takes her from Kolkata to the United States, but the promise of a better life turns into disillusionment. She feels isolated in an unfamiliar culture, unable to connect deeply with her husband or American society, and this growing frustration leads to psychological breakdown and tragic violence. Here, the breakdown of marriage is not only a gender issue but also an issue of cultural displacement.

So, while Deshpande mainly shows how patriarchy shapes marriage from within Indian social structures, Mukherjee demonstrates how patriarchy and migration together intensify marital conflict and emotional instability.

Feminism and Women's Agency

Deshpande's feminism is often called "quiet" because her protagonists rarely make dramatic exits from their marriages or families; instead, they gain inner strength and clarity. They begin to name their suffering, challenge their guilt, and slowly assert their right to be heard. For example, critics note that Jaya's act of finally breaking her long silence is itself a feminist act, even if she does not leave her marriage. Deshpande stresses that Indian feminism must work within the cultural context and that total rejection of family is neither practical nor always desired.

Mukherjee's feminism is more outwardly radical. Her women often cross not just emotional but also physical borders; they may leave their husbands, adopt new partners, or enter illegal or dangerous spaces to survive. Jasmine takes on different roles—caregiver, au pair, lover, undocumented immigrant—each choice challenging fixed ideas of how an "Indian woman" should behave. Mukherjee's heroines claim sexual and personal agency, even if their methods sometimes appear morally ambiguous.

Thus, Deshpande emphasizes resistance through self-knowledge and negotiation, while Mukherjee highlights resistance through bold transformation and mobility.

Cultural Context and Setting

Deshpande's fiction is firmly located in Indian towns and cities, with detailed attention to domestic interiors, family conversations, festivals, and neighborhood interactions. The world she presents is familiar, stable, and governed by long-standing customs. Even when her characters are educated and urban, they still operate under traditional values of duty, respectability, and family honor. The conflict arises when these values come into tension with personal desires for freedom and self-expression.

Mukherjee's fiction moves across multiple geographies—from villages in Punjab or Bengal to the streets of New York, Florida motels, Canadian suburbs, or Caribbean landscapes. These shifting locations show that the modern Indian woman is no longer confined to national borders but is part of a larger global movement. However, this movement is not smooth; it involves racial prejudice, legal vulnerability, and the fear of not belonging anywhere.

Feature	Deshpande	Mukherjee
Main setting	Indian middle-class homes	Transnational migrant routes
Cultural feel	Stable, conservative, rooted	Fluid, diverse, uncertain
Type of conflict	Social expectations vs. self	Culture clash, racism, exile

In this way, Deshpande's world represents depth within one culture, and Mukherjee's world represents breadth across many cultures.

Use of Violence and Trauma

Violence in Deshpande's novels often takes the form of psychological pressure rather than spectacular physical scenes. Women are hurt by harsh words, emotional neglect, favoritism toward sons, or constant criticism from parents and spouses. In The Dark Holds No Terrors, Saru carries trauma from childhood because she is unfairly blamed for her brother's accidental death and repeatedly told by her mother that she is a cause of misfortune. This emotional wound shapes her adult insecurities and her troubled marriage.

Mukherjee, by contrast, does not hesitate to show direct, physical violence. In Jasmine, the heroine witnesses and experiences brutal acts, including murder and sexual assault, during her journey from India to America. In Wife, Dimple's mental breakdown results in shocking violence within the home. Critics note that such violence in Mukherjee's work often serves as a turning point, pushing the heroine into a new identity or a new phase of life.

Deshpande uses hidden, internal trauma to show how patriarchy works quietly over time, whereas Mukherjee uses sharp, visible trauma to reveal the harsh realities of migration and cultural conflict.

Narrative Style and Technique

Shashi Deshpande

Deshpande's narrative style is generally simple, clear, and realistic, matching her concern with the inner life of ordinary women. She often uses the first-person point of view and a loosely chronological structure, allowing readers to follow the protagonist's memories and reflections like a personal diary. The use of introspection, flashbacks, and interior monologue helps create a close psychological portrait of the character.

Critics have observed that Deshpande sometimes employs a mild form of stream-of-consciousness technique, especially when her heroines think rapidly about past events and present dilemmas. Symbolism in her work is understated; everyday acts such as cooking, cleaning, or writing become symbols of routine and resistance. Her language is conversational but layered with emotional meaning.

Bharati Mukherjee

Mukherjee's narrative style is more energetic and fragmented, reflecting the unsettled lives of immigrants. She frequently uses shifts in time and place, multiple settings, and non-linear storytelling to mirror the disorientation of diasporic existence. Her prose often carries a sense of urgency, as her characters move from one role or country to another.

Symbolism plays a stronger role in Mukherjee's work. For example, in Jasmine, the journey from India to America, the illegal crossing of borders, and even the change of clothes are symbolic of rebirth and transformation. Critics also point out that Mukherjee's use of violent or shocking scenes is not just for drama but to show how identities are broken and recreated under pressure.

Where Deshpande's narrative feels like slow, deep breathing inside a room, Mukherjee's feels like rapid movement across open, sometimes dangerous spaces.

Theoretical Perspectives

Postcolonial Feminism

Postcolonial feminism studies how gender oppression in former colonies like India is tied to both traditional patriarchy and the legacy of colonialism. Deshpande's novels fit into this framework by examining how Indian women remain limited by social structures even in a supposedly independent and modern nation. Her work shows that while legal and political changes may occur, daily life inside the home still reflects deep-rooted hierarchies.

Mukherjee's fiction extends postcolonial feminism into the diasporic context. Her protagonists are no longer just Indian subjects of patriarchy but also racialized minorities in Western societies. They must negotiate both sexism and racism, both traditional customs and Western stereotypes. Critics argue that Mukherjee offers a distinctive vision of the immigrant woman who refuses to remain a victim and instead uses hybridity as a source of strength.

Psychology of Oppression

Deshpande focuses on internalized oppression—the ways women come to believe that they deserve less or that their own desires are wrong. Her characters often blame themselves for problems actually created by unfair social structures. Gradually, through self-analysis, they learn to separate their own voice from the voices of authority figures like fathers, husbands, and mothers-in-law.

Mukherjee, on the other hand, focuses on external oppression: immigration officers, racist neighbors, exploitative employers, and sometimes violent partners. However, she also shows how these external pressures can push women to become stronger and more flexible. The psychological transformation from fear to courage is a key pattern in her fiction.

Existential and Identity Theories

Deshpande's protagonists often face existential questions: "Who am I beyond my roles?" and "What is the meaning of my life if I cannot be myself?" Their search for meaning takes place within confined spaces, but it is no less serious or philosophical.

Mukherjee's characters live out modern identity theories that see the self as multiple and shifting rather than fixed. The immigrant heroine is constantly rewriting her story; each new city or relationship brings a new performance of identity. This fluidity may be painful, but it also allows for creativity and agency.

Key Differences in Representation of Womanhood

Aspect	Shashi Deshpande	Bharati Mukherjee
Primary setting	Indian middle-class domestic space	Global diasporic and transnational space
Main conflict	Internal, psychological, domestic	External, cultural, racial, legal
Identity process	Rediscovery within tradition	Reinvention across cultures
Feminist mode	Quiet, reformative, contextual	Bold, experimental, transnational
Tone	Restrained, introspective, realistic	Intense, fast-moving, often violent
Central themes	Silence, marriage, duty, guilt	Migration, hybridity, exile, transformation
Narrative style	Linear, inward, realistic	Fragmented, outward, symbolic

Taken together, these two writers sketch a broad and rich picture of modern Indian womanhood—from the woman who remains physically in India but battles for inner autonomy, to the woman who crosses oceans and reshapes herself many times in the global arena.

Conclusion

Shashi Deshpande and Bharati Mukherjee, though writing from different physical and cultural locations, are united in their concern for women's search for selfhood in a complex world. Deshpande explores the small, quiet tragedies and gradual awakenings of women who live within Indian families and must negotiate between tradition and individuality. Mukherjee throws her heroines into the turbulence of migration, where old identities break down and new, hybrid identities emerge under the pressure of foreign cultures, racism, and legal vulnerability.

Deshpande's strength lies in her subtle psychological realism, which exposes how deeply patriarchy is woven into everyday life and relationships. Mukherjee's power lies in her bold use of movement, risk, and transformation to show that identity is not a fixed label but a continuous process. Both writers complicate any simple idea of "the Indian woman": she can be silent yet reflective, rooted yet restless, victimized yet capable of reinvention.

By studying these two writers side by side, one can see how Indian English feminist fiction has expanded from the closed space of the home to the open but uncertain space of the globe, capturing the many ways in which women respond to change, conflict, and opportunity. Their works thus remain important not only for literary analysis but also for understanding real social transformations in the lives of Indian and diasporic women today.

References

1. Deshpande, Shashi. That Long Silence. Penguin, 1988.
2. Deshpande, Shashi. The Dark Holds No Terrors. Penguin, 1990.
3. Deshpande, Shashi. The Binding Vine. Penguin, 1993.
4. Mukherjee, Bharati. Jasmine. Grove Press, 1989.
5. Mukherjee, Bharati. Wife. Houghton Mifflin, 1975.
6. Mukherjee, Bharati. Desirable Daughters. Hyperion, 2002.
7. Gope, Gayatri. "Deshpande's That Long Silence and The Dark Holds No Terrors." IJELR.
8. "Indian Feminism in Shashi Deshpande's That Long Silence and The Dark Holds No Terrors." Research Publish.
9. "A Critical Study of Shashi Deshpande's Novel The Dark Holds No Terrors." IJRESM.
10. "Women Novelists in Indian English Literature." Pune Research.
11. "Domesticating and Reinventing Identity and Space in Bharati Mukherjee's Jasmine." IJELS.
12. "Identity and Transformation: Manifestations of Diaspora in Bharati Mukherjee's Jasmine." Arf Journals.

13. “The Evolution of Feminist Thought in Indian English Fiction.” NSS Research Journal.
14. “A Feminist Analysis of Shashi Deshpande’s Novel That Long Silence.” IJELS.
15. “Depiction of Diaspora Identity Crisis and Cultural Conflict in Bharati Mukherjee’s Novels.” IJNRD.
16. “Feminism in the Novels of Shashi Deshpande.” JETIR.
17. “Traumatic State of Diasporic Woman in Bharati Mukherjee’s Fiction.” RJOE.
18. “A Study of Select Novels by Anita Desai, Shashi Deshpande and Bharati Mukherjee.” Social Studies Journal.
19. “Reimagining Gender: Exploring Feminist Consciousness in Shashi Deshpande’s Literary Landscape.” IJRASET.